gagements have for the most part been favorable to the allies. German heavy artillory was severely damaged by French shells in the region to the south of Ypres and St. Eloi, the French gunners proving the more expert range finders and practically putting three heavy batteries out of the fight.

Further south in the neighborhood of Fay, a town south and west of Peronne, another violent artillery duel lasted throughout the day, but there was nothing decisive to report as a result of it. On the centre, however, French gunners had another signal success in an artillery duel, destroying an entire battery in the region about Craonne.

This fight marks a vigorous resump-tion by the allies of their offensive in the region between the Alsne and the Lette Rivers, which also included a hot which the French more than held their own. Vendresse is five miles west of Craonne, and three miles north of the Alsne, and it is the nearest point to Laon, which the allies have attacked from the Alsne battle line.
